

said that she was left untreated by Iraqi doctors, but when they "rescued her" her broken arm and thigh, and dislocated ankle were all treated and on the mend. The daring rescue was bullshit, the elite team met with no resistance, the video images released by the Pentagon controlled "Combat Camera" had explosions and gun fire in the background, but these were all special effects, the "rescuers" were lead without incident to her room by the doctors.

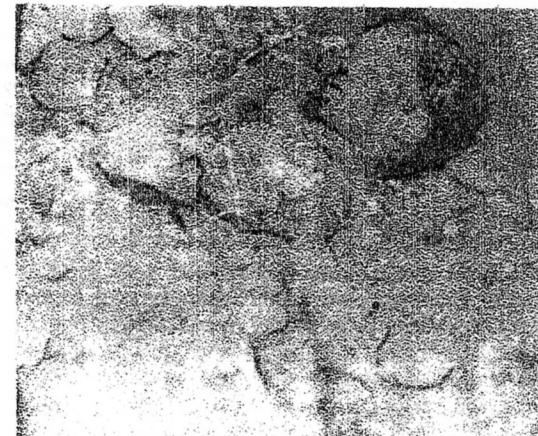

On Thanksgiving we watched our Commander in Chief carve the turkey with the troops in Baghdad, later we find out that the turkey was a plastic prop, but the photo op was priceless publicity for his upcoming election campaign. It all follows a pattern. On May first Bush landed on the USS Abraham Lincoln, and declared mission accomplished. Just another photo op that cost taxpayers over one million dollars. Its all plastic, even the capture of Saddam was plastic, Bush and Paul Bremer both stated that US Forces caught Hussein, but European news outlets have reported that a Kurdish militia caught Saddam and negotiated with the US, and then left him drugged in a hole for the "Combat Camera" crew to take into custody.

A Differing World-View

Since this is an attempt to get real news to the public, necessary questions arise as to why our media is being censored. What do the powers-that-be have in mind when they decide what the American public can and cannot see? Not only do they control what we see and hear; they control how we think about it. Our western point of view is valued over others; American culture seems to promote the idea that somehow we are better than other cultures, countries, or people. We are barraged every day from every medium; the propaganda the powers-that-be wants drill into our heads.

Advertisements are everywhere trying to sell anything to anyone. Never is anyone taught or asked how our life style imposes on other people of the world. If the majority of Americans knew how we have affected the global economy, in forms of "free-market" in the third world, or free-trade zones, would Americans continue with such an attitude towards consumerism? Would they support the big corporate bodies buying our politicians, and exploiting the less privileged people of the world, as well as the American worker/taxpayer? If the American citizens could actually see the terrible affects of war in all its forms, would we still send our sons and daughters to be slaughtered for some cynical power grab? We need to open our eyes to a different perspective about what it really means to be a patriot and an American. What have the government/corporations done in our name that is being kept from us? We need to stand up and start asking questions—We need answers.

Got War?

The Red Pill

Vol. 1 No. 1

Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer!

The Red Pill vs. The Mainstream

The driving force behind this pamphlet is to inform, to give the uninformed a quick overview of all of the news that the mainstream didn't have time to run. You know the real stories, the one's that get buried, and now that this nation's media has been consolidated down to six corporations, stories that get buried stay buried. Noam Chomsky said that the key to seeing through mass media racket is to ask: What are they selling? What does the Daily Sentinel sell? (Hint: its not newspapers.) They're selling you, selling readers to the advertisers.

Advertisers are censors. Money and business interest kill stories and investigations. For example, every year thousands of Americans die due to corporate negligence with little media fanfare, this is due in part to the viewers own blood lust, which favors war, crime, and natural disasters. The other factor in the mass media black out on corporate polluting, and negligence resulting in death, is that the corporate behemoths hold the purse strings. Honestly, what newspapers could afford to lose the Nike or the Wal-Mart account? None of them, so leverage is applied, stories die, and we lose. In the last couple of decades we have gone from tens of thousands of locally owned newspapers, radio, and broadcast media outlets to today where six companies control 95% of this nation's media. This nation holds its freedom of press dear. A well-informed populace is essential to a functioning democracy. How well informed are we? How well is our democracy working? Media consolidation has an adverse effect on how well informed we are. The big six limit choice; there is hardly any dissent in the mainstream media.

We have about fifteen hundred daily newspapers and not one of them have come out against Gulf War I, the Kosovo War, The Afghan War, or the Gulf War II, nor has a single daily in America come out against the ensuing occupations. This seems impossible to me, odds would have at least one newspaper coming out against these unnecessary wars. There is the old journalism parable about the visiting Soviet journalist during the 80's. The journalist reads the papers, watches the news, and then after a week of observing our media he asks: "How do you get all the media to say the same thing, in Russia we have to imprison people, torture people, and use state run media to achieve the same results?" We do, technically, have a freedom of press from government censorship, but corporate censorship, and advertiser censorship reign supreme. Editors, unwilling to piss off a major advertiser, kill articles; the journalist in the field kills articles because they know the rules. The customer is always right, and again who is the consumer in the media racket—Advertisers.

Mohamed Atta's Luggage?

On the morning of September Eleventh, Mohamed Atta was to fly from Portland Maine to Boston, and from Boston to L.A. In Portland he checked two bags through all the way to L.A. His bags contained "a hand held electronic flight computer; a simulator procedures manual for Boeing 757 and 767 aircrafts; two video tapes relating to 'air tours' of the Boeing 757 747 aircrafts; a slide-rule flight calculator; and a copy of the Quran" "a Saudi passport, an international driver's license, a religious cassette tape," "airline uniforms" Atta's will, and a strange note. Wasn't his luggage destroyed when it slammed into the north tower? No, it missed the connection and was waiting for investigators in Boston's Logan International Airport. The mainstream media at the time never questioned the "lucky" circumstances in which the bags were found. Why would he bring the bags onto a suicide mission? Maybe he checked the bags as to avoid suspicion, but then why would his will be in the bags? Why would he bring such hard to find air terror aids, only to destroy them, instead of giving them to future terrorists? Keep in mind, these bags were checked through, not carry on, so he couldn't have used their contents to carry out 9/11.

The note in his bag is highly suspect. The note as translated by The Washington Post "In the name of God, the most merciful, the most compassionate... In the name of God, of myself, and of my family... The time of Fun and waste is gone... be optimistic... Check all your items—your bag, your clothes, your knives, your will, your ID's, your passport... In the morning, try to pray the morning prayer with an open heart." Under the heading of "last night" presumably September 10th the writer of the note tells his followers to "remind yourself that in the night you will face many challenges. But you have to face them and understand it 100 percent. Obey God his messenger, and don't fight among yourself [sic] where [sic] you become weak... Everybody hates death, fears death." The writer of this note was not a Muslim. First off no Muslim would begin a prayer/note with "... In the name of God, of myself, and of my family." A Muslim would never include his family in such a prayer, and whenever a Muslim mentions God he would mention the Prophet Mohamed immediately afterwards. No true believer would "hate death" nor "fear death;" a true believer would believe that his death would be a beginning of a new life in paradise. Even weirder is that the writer of the note encourages his fellow terrorist to recite the Morning Prayer, then the writer quotes from the Morning Prayer, this is as ridiculous as a Christian being reminded how to say the Lord's Prayer.

I personally believe that Atta's luggage is just too convenient for the government, and too illogical from a common sense perspective. The contents of the bags backed up the government's official version of the truth perfectly; the note mentions the knives, which the official story has said time and again were the only weapons used, despite evidence to the contrary. The contents of the bags are illogical if you take into consideration that Atta knew they were going to be destroyed, his will, valuable computers and other aids in air terror that could be used by future terrorist, it doesn't add up. I think the government packed the bag. It would explain the miraculous recovery at the airport, it would explain the shoddy Islamic note, and it would explain the "evidence" in Atta's bag that backed up many of the otherwise un-provable assertions of the official story.

The Plastic War

Plastic being synonymous with fake, like plastic tits, and plastic X-mass trees, I think plastic is the perfect fit for this fraudulent war in Iraq. The plastic war began with plastic intelligence, and outright lies by top officials. Bush's claim that Saddam was seeking uranium from Nigeria turned out to be fake, and on top of that it appears that the administration knew that the claim was a fake, yet they continued in their march to war. Claims about Saddam Hussein's WMD have obviously fizzled. Tony Blair went as far as saying "Some of the WMD [could] be ready within 45 minutes." If weapons could be ready for use in 45 minutes why has nine months of searching come up with nothing? It turned out later that the "intelligence" this claim was taken from was a "dossier" that was cut and pasted together off of the Internet by England's secret service MI6. The claims that Iraq was in cahoots with Al-Qaeda are also false. The main accusation was that Mohamed Atta met with an Iraq official in Prague April 8-11th of 2001, but the FBI investigation showed the Atta was in Virginia Beach, Virginia at the time. So with these plastic justifications we were dragged into war. No WMD have been found, and now the justification for war has turned to the "liberation" of Iraq from the genocidal totalitarian Saddam Hussein, and much has since been made of his human right violations, gassing of the Kurds, and the gassing of Iranian troops, but what is little talked about is that American companies along with our government sold the chemicals to Saddam. When Saddam was gassing Iranians we were providing satellite photos, and intelligence to Saddam helping him gas Iranians. In 1988, when Saddam gassed his own people, the Regan and Bush Sr. Administration continued to provide military aid to Iraq. In that attack tens of thousands of Kurds died. In the decade following the 1991 Gulf War an estimated 1million Iraqi children died as a direct result of our military targeting water sanitization infrastructure, and the UN sanctions that prohibited the sale of life saving chemicals for water purification. It is more than safe to say that our government in our name has killed many more Iraqi civilians than Saddam and his Ba'ath Party. To me "liberation" falls on deaf ears.

The plastic war has been very much a PR job. Embedded journalist was the first step to censoring war. The Pentagon censored or approved every image of war that we saw on T.V. The censorship resulted in a sanitized war where we didn't see the mass carnage that we inflicted on the civilian, and the mostly conscript Iraqi Army. In addition to controlling the flow of information via "In Bed" journalist, the Bush administration prohibited photographs of the body bags and flag covered coffins that arrive back in the states daily. The war on CNN, and the war on Fox news is not the war on the ground.

The pentagon has taken the propaganda war further than just limiting the supply of information. The Pentagon actively created its own news. Take for example POW Jessica Lynch's "daring nighttime rescue." The Pentagon grew the myth. They said that she suffered gun shot wounds, stab wounds, and even that she fought them off with her bare hands, all of which turns out to be false, all her injuries were sustained when her vehicle was turned. The Pentagon
